Become a Legend in King Arthur's Time...

Squire Lancelot rode east and was wading through a ford. Though the river was wide and shallow, it ran swiftly here, tumbling and foaming. Lancelot could see the Black Knight.

The Black Knight sat straight and proud upon his horse and challenged Lancelot. "Squire, no man can pass this way save with my permission. You must prove your worth before you may cross this ford".
"My command, sire?"

Black Knight

Squire Lancelot rode east and was on a road lined with great oaks. Between their branches he could see peasants at work on the land. At the eastern end of the long straight road, the great city of Camelot, its pale walls reflecting the colours of the setting sun, seemed to glow in evening. Each time he looked up, Lancelot spurred on his mount, eager to reach his goal, with all speed.
"My command, sire?"

Camelot

Squire Lancelot went north and was in the study, a small square room with a window in one wall and doorways to north and east. Shelves and bookshelves hung from the walls, and curiously fashioned devices of wood and brass stood upon the table and the floor. Lancelot could see Merlin. The rooming was strewn through the window, and set a rainbow gleaming from a great glass.
"Merlin said, 'Greetings, Lancelot. Your coming was foretold to me in a dream'."
