THE GAME

Hyperspace travel always was tricky. However, you have normally arrived in one piece - O.K. so maybe not where you wanted to get to and molten lava does corrode spaceships - but in one piece. Not so this time, you have arrived in eight pieces.

So here you are, materialised out of hyperspace, lost, and with your spaceship splintered and scattered. You have managed to survive, and have your scout capsule to aid you. Sensors in the scout indicate that there are pieces of your craft on all eight of the planets of the system, whatever system this is.

To reach and reclaim the fragments you need to search through the planets. Unfortunately they are inhabited by the most vicious aliens you have ever encountered. Fortunately your scout is at least armed with a forward firing laser.

Just to add to your problems the planets consist of numerous islands, set in a sea of what your sensors tell you is not impure H_2O like Earth's but pure H_2SO_4 . Now you have guessed it, the one thing they forgot to make the scout resistant to was glacial sulphuric acid. If you fall into the sea it is a case of plink, fizz, fizz!

In this current state the scout can only make short hops, but if you could find the wings you would be able to fly. Until then you are just going to have to get it right.

At the bottom of the screen the icons inform you of which extra features you have acquired. These eventually run out and you return to the basic craft.

When you reach the wreckage, you pick it up and take off for the next planet, there is then a short bonus sequence, before you start again on the next planet. When you have visited all eight planets, you will be able to rebuild your ship and return home. Congratulations will most definitely be in order, but this time do try to get the hyperspace jumps right.
