Female athletes have not always been respected. Some sports only allow men to play. Many people ignore female sports. The Olympics used to do this, too. At first, no women were allowed to play in the Olympic Games. This changed in 1900. This was when women were allowed to compete. Today, female athletes win a lot of medals! Women's sports are a lot of fun to watch in the Games.

The History of the Olympics

The Olympic Torch in Beijing, 2008

The Olympics are games played every two years. Countries from around the world compete. Athletes win medals. Gold is for first place. Silver is for second place. Bronze is for third place. The Games move from place to place. It is an honor for any city to host the Olympic Games. They are a tradition that people from all over enjoy watching.

The Olympics are divided into Winter Games and Summer Games. They alternate, so every two years, one of the games is played. The Winter Games host winter sports. These include skating and skiing. They also include the bobsled and luge. There are 15 winter sports.

The Summer Games host summer sports. Swimming is a popular summer sport. So are cycling and track events. There are 42 summer sports.

There have been a few rare times when there were no Olympics. World War I and World War II forced people to cancel the Games. This happened in 1916, 1940, and 1944.

The Olympic Games have been around for thousands of years. They began in Greece. They started in ancient times. Ancient Greeks liked competitions. They took the Games seriously.

Over the years, sports that are played in the Games have changed. In fact, the first Games had only one sport. It was called the stade. It was a foot race. Today's sports change every once in a while. There used to be a boating competition. Polo was also played at the games. These two sports are no longer part of the Olympics.

The Olympics are a part of history. They are a symbol of goodwill. They bring people together from all over the world. People are happy to see who will win or lose. Yet the Olympics are about more than winning. They are about being a part of a tradition. They are about celebrating the global community.
